Logboat Brewery, a craft brewery distributing around the state of Missouri, sought to diversify their production into wood-aged and sour beer, as well as cider via a new company: Waves Cider Co. After purchasing an existing industrial building just off of Columbia's reviving Business Loop, the brewers approached SOA to redesign the structure into a research and development facility.

The brewery space is divided into an area for beer production on the south end and cider production on the north. The program also called for a small tasting room and patio with views into the brewery. Glass garage doors allow for easier move-in and move-out of equipment, and sliding glass doors allow a connection to the outdoors. The overall space layout allows for flexibility so that the company could expand production into other products.

Aesthetic features include a wood slat ceiling, a bar supported by wood barrels, and staining of an existing lava rock wall to freshen up a dated front facade. The concept was to keep the building simple and let the focus be on the brewing equipment.

"Working with SOA has been an incredible experience which has allowed me to focus on running my business, not managing a new construction project. Their attention to detail, professionalism, experience, and organization has made our project flow seamlessly, on a budget, and on time. I can't recommend SOA enough for any commercial architectural needs."
